

nephew. I think the fact that everyone is most likely very close to one another is one

←

Document tabs +

📄 Tab 1 ⋮

Headings you add to the document will appear here.

misconception that this photo presents. And, there are many people in this photo, grabbing onto each other's shoulders and smiling, who, minutes before this was taken, were arguing with each other.

This image presented our family as being pretty close to perfect, even when that is not the case at all. My family also decided to share this photo with countless others through a holiday card. This act showed me how skewed the reality of the photos shared online of families can be, and to not take them extremely literally. Friends sharing photos of their seemingly perfect families on social media gave me deep insecurities of my own family, showing me how social media can pass off lies as truths incredibly easily.